(1) The chief function of science, as a part of school education, is not to impart information, but to offer a training in the scientific method by which the mind works up the concrete facts of nature into generalizations. Hence a text-book should show how investigations are conducted; and, for this purpose, the method by which the process of combustion and the composition of air and of water were discovered are presented with some detail. (2) An elementary text-book should also state some of the generalizations or laws of chemistry, as it is a knowledge of these that indicates clearly that chemistry is a science. Moreover, it is essential, in order that these laws should be properly understood, that a knowledge of important substances, their methods of preparation, and their properties should be stated, as it is only by means of such knowledge that the generalizations can be approached. (3) Side by side with the advance in the...
